Aswan, 8-11 December 2017

Professor Christopher Eyre

Professor of Egyptology at the University at the University of Liverpool, where he has been a staff member since 1977, Christopher Eyre originally studied Ancient Egyptian with Akkadian in the University of Oxford, graduating with a doctorate examining Employment and Labour Relations in the Theban Necropolis. He has worked on site in Egypt as an epigrapher in tombs of both the Old and New Kingdoms at Saqqara, as well as the Temple of Seti I at Abydos. Publications include monographs on The Cannibal Hymn, a ritual of the Pyramid Texts, and on The Use of Documents in Pharaonic Egypt, and papers concerned with the economy, the agricultural regime, and social relationships in pharaonic Egypt. Much of his current research is concerned with applying a more ethnographic approach to the Egyptian record, targetting a more realistic understanding and more contemporary description of cultural, social and religious behaviour in the pharaonic period, and on continuities in the history of Egypt from ancient to modern.
